THE LANESBOROUGH COGNAC PARADIS

The angels take a share of all spirits during the maturation in wooden barrels. On average, about 2% of the volume is lost in this way each year, and that's why aged spirits become rarest as the years pass by.

THE YEAR OF SCOTTISH SINGLE MALT WHISKY

Many consumers are “blinded” by the arbitrary geography of Single Malt whiskies and believe that the region dictates the flavour profile.

We prefer to present our selection based on the flavour profiles of each whisky, knowing that most of the flavours and colours will come from the barrels that will be used during the maturation.

DELICATE, FRESH FRUITS & HERBAL NOTES

Usually these whiskies will spend many years in barrels that once were used for the production of American Bourbon. The wood used to make these barrels is the American Oak - Quercus alba.

Typical flavours associated with this oak are vanilla, citrus & coconut. These whiskies tend to be lighter in style.

FULL BODIED, RIPE FRUITS & SPICES

Usually these whiskies have been aged in barrels that have been seasoned in Jerez, Spain, for the production of Oloroso Sherry wines, or sometimes they also contain a blend of aged whiskies in ex Bourbon barrels. The wood used in Spain for the barrels is usually the European Oak – Quercus robur, rich in tannin and once emptied of Sherry, the typical flavours associated are dried fruits, orange citrus and spices. These whiskies tend to be heavier in style.

SMOKINESS – PEPPERY – PEATY

Peat is earth that consists of compact accumulation of decomposed grasses, moss, trees, roots, dead animals and soil over thousand of years. Historically used as a source of fuel when dried, the peat burns during the drying process of barley, and the dense smoke is absorbed by the grains. This phenolic flavour remains throughout the entire whisky making process and the level of smokiness is determined by the time that the barley grain is exposed to the pungent peat smoke.
